It's also possible to filter saved files based on whether the current image is "under RAW transform." If you use this feature, you can limit the impact of RAW transform. Instead of taking your whole selection to the RAW converter, it will only alter the selected area so that it can reduce the impact it has on the entire image in your photo library. This is a less comprehensive approach than it sounds. It still requires you to do a lot of manual work and it won't avoid you from working on the majority of your images, but at least you'll have some time to work on some RAW images. As far as Lightroom's metadata goes, it's pretty much the same as one would expect. It's nice that the basic categories like File type and Modification date are now available in the timeline. Though the organization of the files is a bit disorganized, at least it works like inside Lightroom. Changing to a different folder is also much more easy - from the folder list, you can easily move between them. This is where the "new" comes in. The new features in the development portion of Lightroom 5 offer many improvements over CS5. The Black and White adjustment panel is now a five slider UI - instead of only four. There's no more "monochrome" slider, which has been replaced by a new "Desaturate" slider and a metamerism slider. Still no "Equalize" slider, though the camera profiles panel offers equalizing adjustments. You can also now independently edit information appearing in the histogram as well as the rendered image.
